

RAF Bomber direction finding Meter

Used with a loop mounted on the top of the plane

The operator rotated the loop until both needles were vertical

This was repeated on two or three signals from known locations

The compass reading on each signal was given to the navigator

The navigator could then plot the bearing on the map

Giving the crew, a very accurate location fix on the map

It was especially useful at night, when no landmarks were visible